“Yass Queen!” Magnifying the Psychological Benefits of Affirming Black Aesthetics

Afiya Mbilishaka, University of District of Columbia

Ecclesia Holmes, University of Georgia, presiding

Everyday across the globe, Black people have to navigate institutions that meet their presence with policies that police their appearance. Colorism and hair bias have found space within relationships, schools, and employment since the enslavement of Africans in the Americas. Mental health professionals have an ethical responsibility to develop culturally responsive techniques to investigate the psycho-emotional outcomes of discriminatory experiences for Black aesthetics. This presentation will explore the historical context of aesthetic trauma and anti-Blackness, to magnify various techniques at the individual and group level to affirm Black aesthetics through narrative methods, salon-based groups, anti-bias teacher trainings, social media, and policy level interventions.

At the end of this session, participants will be able to:

- Define aesthetic trauma on individual and institutional levels.
- Describe a historical timeline for bias against Black aesthetics.
- Propose complimentary interventions that affirm individuals’ self-worth through Black aesthetics.

Reclaiming Our Time: How to Survive and Thrive in the Face of Gendered Racism

Jioni A. Lewis
University of Tennessee

Sharon Pearcey, Kennesaw State University, presiding

Although women of color often experience the intersections of racism and sexism in their daily lives, much of the research and clinical practice in psychology has tended to focus on separating and teasing apart the experiences of racism and sexism. The purpose of this presentation is to highlight the importance of applying intersectionality theory to our understanding of racism and sexism by centering the experiences of women of color. This presentation will discuss research on gendered racism and identify the psychological effects of gendered racism. In addition, this presentation will highlight the importance of developing healthy coping strategies, cultivating gendered racial identity, and engaging in radical healing as a form of resistance in the current sociopolitical climate.

At the end of this session, participants will be able to:

- Define the concept of gendered racism and gendered racial microaggressions.
- Describe the psychological effects of gendered racism.
- Identify how individuals can engage in healthy coping strategies in the face of gendered racism.

Vanderbilt University

Sharon Pearcey, Kennesaw State University, presiding

Research in visual object recognition has largely focused on mechanisms common to most people, but there is increased interest in whether and how people differ in the ability to recognize objects and faces. New tests with a variety of familiar categories are being created and validated to measure domain-specific abilities. Because variability in experience with familiar objects contributes to performance, tests with novel objects were designed and recent work using them provides evidence for a domain-general visual ability that is relatively independent from general intelligence. This talk will review recent research on efforts to measure the role of a general visual ability and the role of experience in our abilities in recognizing faces and objects. It will review behavioral studies as well as research measuring functional and structural brain correlates of object recognition skills.

At the end of this session, participants will be able to:

- Describe the differences between domain-specific and domain-general influences in object recognition.
- Explain the evidence supporting the idea that object recognition ability is not explained by general intelligence.
- Identify real-world domains in which object recognition ability applies.
- Identify some of the brain correlates of visual object recognition.

An Introduction to Multilevel Modeling

Zachary Himmelberger & Karen Beale
Maryville College

Workshop Description:

Multilevel modeling is a flexible data analytic technique that has become very popular in the behavioral and social sciences. Understanding the uses—and misuses—of this technique allows researchers and other professionals to better engage with their field. This workshop is designed to build on knowledge of simple linear regression. No previous experience with multilevel modeling is necessary. We will draw on examples from a range of sub-disciplines and research designs to support understanding of the technique. Finally, this workshop will describe how to interpret multilevel models in published manuscripts in order to facilitate statistical literacy.

Learning Objectives:

At the end of this session, participants will be able to:

- Identify the appropriate research context in which to apply a multilevel modeling framework.
- Describe how to read and critically evaluate published research that uses multilevel modeling.
- Describe statistical models in clear, concise language.
- Articulate the assumptions of a given statistical model.
- Discuss how to implement a basic multilevel model.
- Identify useful resources for further education on multilevel modeling.

Level: Intermediate, 3 CE credits (with paid $50 fee)

Target Population: This session is open to all attendees. The only requirement is that participants have a working knowledge of simple linear regression.

The concept of implicit bias has received considerable attention in recent years, especially as researchers have had increasing difficulty finding variation in explicit prejudice in the laboratory. Still, many of us—regardless of our social categories—remain resistant to the possibility that our own judgments and perceptions may be distorted by bias. This resistance is a special problem in the classroom, where faculty and students must bridge gaps in experience in order to understand each other. Even in classrooms where interracial or intergender teaching is the exception, education level, age, and other demographic differences present challenges for reaching students who are different from their instructor. In this session, we will discuss the subtle nature of biases and how they may directly and indirectly influence students’ chances of success in the classroom and the outside world. By reviewing literature on the nature of prejudice, student perceptions of fit in the college classroom, and investigations of bias in the workplace, we will discuss measures faculty can take to ensure that all students have the best chances of success, in the classroom and beyond.

At the end of this session, participants will be able to:

- Describe basic theories of stereotypes and prejudice and their roles in our everyday lives.
- Identify potential hurdles that women, people of color, and other groups often encounter in their progression through different life stages.
- Define strategies to foster students’ identities as students, thus maximizing students’ senses of authenticity, inclusion, and belonging in the classroom.

Some SEPA Governance History: Business Meetings, Executive Committee Meetings, and Constitutions

James L. Pate, Georgia State University

The SEPA has held an annual Business Meeting each year since its 1955 meeting. Attendance and actions at those meetings have varied tremendously over the years, and some highlights of those meetings will be discussed. Executive Committee meetings also have occurred each year since the initial meeting in 1955 with a peak of three sessions at some annual meetings. An annual retreat is a relatively new type of Executive Committee meeting. The initial constitution, written by E.E. Cureton, was accepted in 1955 and has been amended extensively during the 65 years of the SEPA’s existence. The relations among these three aspects of governance will be discussed.

The internet is rapidly changing how information is found, used, and shared with others – with consequences for cognition. I will discuss how this emerging area of research can be grounded in basic cognitive science research and how it links to past work on technology and cognition; these approaches will be contrasted to how the science is covered in popular media. I will then discuss some specific internet-related phenomena, such as the effects of habitual reliance on the internet and the metacognitive consequences of searching the internet for information. I will close with speculations about whether this digital expansion of the mind has consequences for cognition even when one is not using the internet.

At the end of this session, participants will be able to:

- Describe common cognitive processes and their contribution to internet phenomena.
- Identify the popular media’s description of cognition in the internet age.
- Describe new studies showing the consequences of internet searching for beliefs about what one knows.

Research is clear that students of psychology are well suited to understand human experiences from all angles because they have wide-ranging theoretical and empirical training that prepares them to critically analyze behavior, thoughts, and emotions. Such broad-based training makes psychologists highly versatile in the workforce and also prepares them well to navigate increasingly challenging life circumstances. Interestingly, though, as psychologists advance in their training they tend to segment themselves into narrow areas of expertise and identity, with each typically focusing on particular niche topics through research or practice. Doing so may limit career flexibility in an era when the average adult is likely to pursue multiple career paths over their working years. This presentation will explore norms for training and practice at various levels in psychology that can impact the ways in which psychologists think about their own professional identities and versatility, and suggest examples of how rethinking professional expertise more broadly can enhance opportunity.

At the end of this session, participants will be able to:

• Discuss the benefits of broad-based training in psychology.
• Describe the benefits and costs of professionals in psychology coming to identify with particular specialties within the field as they advance in their training.
• Identify examples of how the ability to apply knowledge of psychological theories and research inform potential success in a wide range of career opportunities.

The Past, Present, and the Future, of Intro Psych

Danae Hudson, Missouri State University
Regan Gurung, Oregon State University
Jane S. Halonen, University of West Florida

Every year over one million students take an undergraduate introductory psychology course (Gurung et al., 2016) and an additional 300,000 students take AP Psychology in high schools (College Board, 2016). Unfortunately, although many students successfully pass the course, very few of them retain the content (Landrum & Gurung, 2013). Based on the work of two APA Board of Educational Affairs task forces examining the common core and assessment practices of introductory psychology, a new APA, nationally representative committee was formed in 2018. The goal of the Introductory Psychology Initiative (IPI) is to make evidence-based recommendations for the future of teaching of introductory psychology. This session will provide a brief history leading up to the formation of the IPI, an overview of the four working groups (Student Learning Goals/Outcomes and Assessment, Course Models and Design, Teacher Training and Development, Student Success and Transformation) and their preliminary recommendations, and share results from the first nationwide survey of introductory psychology instructors. There will be an opportunity for audience members to ask questions and offer feedback.

What About the Self of the Psychologist? Self Care Sense of Self

Charles R. Figley
Tulane University

Sharon Pearcey, Kennesaw State University, presiding

This session offers perspectives on practitioner mental health for themselves and why they rarely develop useful self-care plans. The goal of the presentation is to enable the audience member to be more aware of who he/she is as a psychologist and how best to enhance his/her practice effectiveness through greater self-care enhanced by a self-care plan.

At the end of this session, participants will be able to:

- Define the mental health risk and protective factors associated with compassion fatigue.
- Describe the importance of the self in the context of self care.
- Identify a self-care plan that is explicit, written, and up-to-date.

Neuropsychology: The Origins and Future of Psychology

Antonio E. Puente
University of North Carolina Wilmington

Sharon Pearcey, Kennesaw State University, presiding

Psychology’s over 125-year history has focused on the making of our discipline a scientific enterprise. Whereas it could be argued that our questions are no original, there is no doubt that our methodology adds a unique approach that historically as not previously been present in addressing these age-old questions. In pursuing that goal, it can be argued that psychology has failed to acknowledge and relish our foundations dating back to the works of Wundt and James with its strong focus on the neuropsychological foundations of psychological processes. In the pursuit of psychology as a science, it can be further argued that we have confused behaviorism with behavioral (and as such, experimental) methodology. This confusion has had an indirect impact on restricting psychology to behavioral processes and interpretations. Not until the more recent ideas of neuropsychologists such as Sperry and cognitive psychologists such as Miller, has behaviorism as a psychological paradigm and as a restriction to a comprehensive understanding of psychology been questioned. As an alternative, the appreciation of both psychology’s origins with its experimental procedures will not only remedy to century long restriction of psychological paradigms but provide a brighter and more robust horizon.

At the end of this session, participants will be able to:

- Describe the origins of psychological science as neuropsychological.
- Articulate the importance and limitations of behaviorism as a paradigm.
- Describe the importance of interfacing the field’s neuropsychological origins with experimental methodology to provide a more robust psychology.

Cognitive Science of Religious Belief and Behavior: A Symposium in Memory of Kevin J. Eames

David Washburn, Covenant College, presiding

When SEPA President-Elect Kevin Eames died suddenly in June 2019, he left a legacy of scholarship and service, as well as a host of heartbroken family members, colleagues, students, and friends. In recognition of his longstanding commitment to SEPA during his too-short life, this symposium celebrates Dr. Eames by bringing together leaders in his primary area of scholarship: the cognitive psychology of religion. After a brief biographical talk that will include discussion of Dr. Eames’ 2016 book, Cognitive Psychology of Religion, three outstanding national scholars in the study of religious belief and behavior will discuss their research.
